Excerpt from book: CHAPTER III. yes;A Lie! So you went to Happerton after all, said Lopez to his ally, Mr. Sextus Parker. You could nt believe me when I told you the money was all right! What a cur you are! That s right;abuse me. Well, it was horrid. Did nt I tell you that it must necessarily injure me with the house? How are two fellows to get on together unless they can put some trust in each other? Even if I did run you into a difficulty, do you really think I m ruffian enough to tell you that the money was there if it were untrue?

Sexty looked like a cur and felt like a cur, as he was being thus abused. He was not angry with his friend for calling him bad names, but only anxious to excuse himself. I was out of sorts, he said, and so d hippish I did nt know what I was about.

Brandy and soda! suggested Lopez. Perhaps a little of that;though, by Jove, it is nt often I do that kind of thing. I dont know a fellow who works harder for his wife and children than I do. But when one sees such things all round one,a fellow utterly smashed here who had a string of hunters yesterday, and another fellow buying a house in Piccadilly and pulling it down because it is nt big enough, who was contented with a little box at Hornsey lastsummer, one does nt quite know how to keep ones legs. If you want to learn a lesson look at the two men, and see where the difference lies. The one has had some heart about him, and the other has been a coward. Parker scratched his head, balanced himself on the hind legs of his stool, and tacitly acknowledged the truth of all that his enterprising friend said to him. Has old Wharton come down well ? at last he asked. I have never said a word to old Wharton about money, Lopez replied, except as to the c...
